World Day of Social Justice 2025 History

The World Day of Social Justice was announced as a day of significance by the United Nations General Assembly on 26 November 2007. 20th February was chosen as the day to celebrate this day. On 10 June 2008, the ILO Declaration for Social Justice was unanimously adopted for a Fair Globalisation.

In 1995, the World Summit for Social Development took place in Copenhagen, Denmark, where over 100 political leaders committed to fighting poverty, ensuring full employment, and creating stable, safe societies. They also agreed that people should be the focus of development plans.

In February 2005, UN member states reviewed the Copenhagen Declaration and discussed ways to further advance social development. On November 26, 2007, the UN General Assembly declared February 20 as World Day of Social Justice, first observed in 2009.

The World Summit emphasized that social development should focus on justice, solidarity, harmony, and equality both within and between nations. Social justice, equality, and fairness are essential values for all societies. Governments are responsible for creating frameworks that promote social justice at national, regional, and global levels, ensuring equal job opportunities, fair income distribution, and access to resources for all.

World Day of Social Justice 2025 Significance

World Day of Social Justice 2025 is significant due to the following reasons:

- Fundamental Principle: The observance of World Day of Social Justice is based on the idea that prioritizing social justice should be a core aim of both national and international policies.
- UN Perspective: The United Nations (UN) highlights the importance of advancing decent work and promoting a fair globalization agenda. Advocates stress that essential rights, employment opportunities, social protections, and constructive social dialogue among governments, employers, and workers are necessary to place social justice at the forefront.
- Ongoing Challenges: Despite efforts, the UN acknowledges the persistence of injustices, widespread labour insecurity, rising inequality, and weakened social agreements, all of which have been exacerbated by global crises.
- Link to Peace and Security: Social development and social justice are essential for maintaining peace and security within and among nations. However, these goals cannot be achieved without ensuring peace, security, and the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.
- Impact of Globalization: While globalization and interconnectedness offer new opportunities through trade, investment, capital flows, and technological advancements, including information technology, major challenges remain. These include financial crises, insecurity, poverty, exclusion, and inequality within and between societies, as well as barriers to further integration and full realization of potential.
