The Indian Coast Guard (ICG) was formed to address growing concerns about maritime security, particularly sea-borne smuggling that posed economic risks in the 1960s. The Indian Navy and the Customs Department worked together on anti-smuggling efforts, but the need for a dedicated maritime force became evident.

In 1971, the Nagchaudhuri Committee recommended creating a coastal security force, and by 1974, the Rustamji Committee introduced this idea. As a result, the Indian Coast Guard was officially established on February 1, 1977, under the Ministry of Defence, initially operating with vessels transferred from the Indian Navy. Its duties were formally defined in the Coast Guard Act of 1978.

Over the years, the ICG has expanded its role beyond security to law enforcement, environmental protection, and disaster response. One of its most known operations was the recapture of MV Alondra Rainbow in 1999, showcasing its growing efficiency. After the 2008 Mumbai attacks, the ICG strengthened its surveillance capabilities, showcased India’s maritime defense.
